Many city residents are concerned about the increasing levels of air pollution in urban areas. According to a recent environmental report, nearly 70% of people living in large cities are exposed to unhealthy air quality every day. While some citizens believe that technological developments can help solve this problem, others are worried about its long-term effects on public health. Most environmental experts agree that local governments play a major role in reducing air pollution.

They suggest investing in public transportation, encouraging the use of electric vehicles, and limiting industrial emissions. In addition, many business leaders are expected to adopt environmentally friendly practices to minimize pollution. These measures are considered essential to improving the quality of life in modern cities.

WONDERS OF EGYPT

Many people today think of the pyramids of Giza as the defining icon of ancient Egyptian culture. But who actually built them? For years, we did not know for sure. Now, however, archaeologists have discovered an ancient city near the pyramids. Close by, there is a cemetery where the pyramid builders were buried. From studying these places, archaeologists can now confirm that the pyramids were not built by slaves or foreigners (or space aliens). Ordinary Egyptians built them.

It took about 80 years to build the pyramids. Archaeologists believe that about 20,000–30,000 people were involved in the construction. The workers had different roles. Some dug up the rock, some moved it, and some shaped it into blocks. People also worked on different teams, each with its own name. Workers often competed to see whose team could do a job faster.

Life for these workers was hard. "We can see that in their skeletons," says Azza Mohamed Sarry El-Din, a scientist studying bones found in the cemetery. According to her research, the bones show signs of arthritis. This probably developed from carrying heavy things for a long time. Archaeologists have also found many female skeletons in the ancient city and cemetery. The damage to their bones is similar to that of the men. In fact, their lives may have been even tougher: Male workers generally lived to age 40–45, whereas women lived only to 30–35. However, workers usually had enough food, and they also received medical care if they got sick or hurt.

The task was challenging, but laborers were proud of their work. On a wall in Khufu's Great Pyramid, for example, a group of workers wrote Friends of Khufu. "It's because they were not just building the tomb of their king," says Egyptian archaeologist Zahi Hawass. "They were building Egypt. It was a national project, and everyone was a participant."
